Award-winning exhibition Spontaneous Interventions: Design Actions for the Common Good makes U.S. debut at the Chicago Cultural Center

The City of Chicago’s Department of Cultural Affairs and Special Events (DCASE) is pleased to present Spontaneous Interventions: Design Actions for the Common Good to Chicago for its first U.S. appearance. The exhibition—the official U.S. presentation at the 13th International Architecture Exhibition at the Venice Biennale (2012)—is an environmental installation that has completely transformed the Michigan Avenue Galleries (ground floor) of the Chicago Cultural Center, and will be on view through September 1.

Spontaneous Interventions, organized by Cathy Lang Ho on behalf of the New York nonprofit Institute for Urban Design, is devoted to the growing movement of architects, designers, artists, and everyday citizens acting on their own initiative to bring improvements to the urban realm, creating new opportunities and amenities for the public. The exhibition received over 178,000 visitors in Venice, and earned a Special Mention from the Golden Lion jury, the first time the United States has been honored in the history of the Venice Architecture Biennale. The exhibition design was also named Best Exhibition Design of 2012 by the editors of Architectural Record and a silver medal in the 2012 Spark Awards in the communication design category.

“We’re so pleased that Chicago is the first destination for this thought-provoking display as the City has always been at the forefront of architecture and design,” said DCASE Commissioner Michelle T. Boone.

The Chicago installation features a lively exhibition design of pull-down banners created by Brooklyn design studio Freecell and supergraphics by Berkeley-based communication design firm M-A-D. The show presents 84 projects, including 17 newly added projects and more than a dozen based in Chicago. Please see attached for a full list of artists and organizations featured in the exhibition. Snaking across the exhibition floor is a timeline of city-making and urban activism, which brings visitors to a workshop/resource room featuring a library of recommended reading and a community message board.

“American urbanism always seems to circle back to Chicago: grid, fire, skyscraper, Burnham, rivers reversed, White City, sociology, Jane Addams, the Daleys, the projects, community organizing, urban renewal, greening,” said Michael Sorkin, New York architect, president of the Institute for Urban Design, and founder of Terreform. “We are honored to bring a view of a new, democratic design movement that is growing across the country but with deep roots in America’s most essential city.”

In conjunction with the exhibition at the Chicago Cultural Center, Spontaneous Interventions will include a pop-up “outdoor living room” in Millennium Park, designed by Chicago-based MAS Studio, led by architect Iker Gil, in collaboration with Skidmore, Owings, and Merrill. The space will serve as an outpost for the exhibition and a venue for exhibition-related programs, including talks, panels, tours, workshops and more. The space will feature a colorful canopy and seating made of salvaged lumber by Chicago artist/woodworker John Preus of Dilettante Studios.
“Our goal is to use the exhibition as a framework for understanding a larger movement, in which citizens all over the world are devising and implementing clever, low-barrier urban interventions to make their cities more inclusive, sustainable, pleasurable, and safer,” said Cathy Lang Ho, a New York–based design journalist and curator. “For this reason, we have organized a rich roster of programs that will place the trend of tactical urbanism in the context local urban issues and citizen action.” Program director is Samantha Topol, a Chicago editor and writer.

All summer long, programs will take place at the Cultural Center, in the pop-up outpost in Millennium Park, and at various offsite locations. Many of the programs are organized in partnership with Chicago-based designers, nonprofits, community organizations, and city agencies.
